My strong organisational skills make me an excellent candidate for becoming a successful leader. My talent for keeping everything in the right place means that I can concentrate on more important tasks. And once I've organised my workplace, my overall productivity increases by leaps and bounds.

I'm not a workaholic. Not completely, anyway. Work is pretty important to me, and it plays a significant role in my life, but I'm definitely not strung out on it. I realise there's more to life than the company line. While I might spend a lot of time working, I know that "what I do" isn't synonymous with "who I am". Taking time for hobbies, hanging out with friends, and just relaxing is all very important. These sorts of activities not only energise and refresh me; they also improve my work performance. I have a healthy balance between my life and my job.

I'm not a die-hard romantic who carelessly tosses around loving words, hopeful promises, and doting acts, but I do a pretty great job of expressing my loving feelings. Couple-hood suits me, and I like coming up with new, creative, non-mushy ways of showing my sweetie how I feel. I know very well that there are other ways to show love, respect, and admiration besides all that flowery mumbo-jumbo. Basically, I'm passionately romantic and sweet and sensitive without being excessively sentimental and practical. Because no matter what, it's very important to me that my partner understands how much I care about him and I love how close I feel to him when I tell and show him what's in my heart.

Give and take is part of any relationship. The unspoken agreement to lean on my lover in exchange for my support at another time is part of what makes being in a relationship desirable over being alone. As a lover, I give and fulfil my partner's needs and wishes. In return I experience what it is like to be given to. This is a style I have adopted for my present situation. My style can be seen as a cocktail that gets shaken and stirred whenever I begin a new relationship or even when the dynamics of my current relationship change significantly. The essence remains the same, but the added ingredients, flavours and garnishes change its taste. But I do not give indiscriminately nor do I make unwarranted demands of my partner. My position may be referred to as that of the sharer. I am more likely to go with the flow using this style, giving when I feel I have something to offer, and taking when I see that my partner is in a position to offer me something of value. I am comfortable with myself and am able recognise my own needs and desires as well as those of my partner.

I am ready to take the plunge into the inviting waters of commitment. I have strong feelings for my partner and I am willing to invest what I have into the relationship. Commitment is no small feat, but with the right person and a healthy outlook, the rewards are exponential. I cheer to my future!
