I have strong organisational and project management skills. When others lose sight of the big picture, I help them to stay focused to see what's important and weed out unnecessary details. I am most fulfilled by my work when I am allowed to think creatively and consider new approaches to work. I am not afraid to take calculated risks and see mistakes or failures as opportunity for growth.

I definitely care about how I present myself, but not enough to let my appearance dictate what I do, where I go, and who I spend time with. Sure, I take pride in my appearance, but I know that some things are more important than looks. This is a great attitude - I've achieved a very healthy balance between narcissism and neglect.

I don't possess-to-impress! I follow the trends and have nice things, but I don't abide by the "he who dies with the most toys wins" philosophy. I don't focus on living in luxury. Of course I do indulge myself every once in a while. I pick and choose where I'm going to spend my money and my energy. I might want the top-of-the-line sound system, or maybe I purchase all the breakthrough miracle skin-care products. There's nothing wrong with that! I've got my motivations in the right place. I don't buy brands just to show off the label or drive a convertible to insinuate that I'm rolling in cash. It's easy to get caught up in our "check me out" society, but I've avoided that path. Even though I have an extravagant taste, my spending style is motivated by my values.

I've got the gold! From intros to goodnight kisses, dating just comes naturally to me. In terms of my dating etiquette, I am polite, well mannered and tactful. I know how to behave appropriately on a first date, which is imperative for making a good first impression. I have found the perfect balance between speaking and listening on a first date. I enjoy having a very natural give-and-take dialogue, and I am aware that there are boundaries regarding how much is appropriate to reveal about myself at such an early stage of a relationship. I do not try to please my date by always agreeing with him, and I don't take the spotlight off him by always bringing the attention back to me. I'm a confident woman and I do not feel the need to use my sexuality to get a man. I have found subtle ways to show my interest without acting too available, needy or desperate. I do not regard sex as a way to manipulate my date into wanting to see me again. If, however, I choose to follow my sexual impulses, I do it for the right reasons - not simply to please my date. I continue to be myself and I will soon find Mr. Right!
